

Having cervical cautery

Welcome to the Colposcopy Clinic. This leaflet aims to help women having a cautery to the cervix (neck of the womb). If you have any further questions then please speak to the clinic nurse or doctor.

What is cervical cautery?

Cervical cautery is a method of treating problems associated with the cervix with heat, most commonly post-coital bleeding (bleeding with sexual intercourse).

The procedure will be carried out under local anaesthetic (i.e. you are awake) and you will be able to go home the same day after the procedure.

Will it be painful afterwards?

Some women do experience a slight abdominal discomfort for a few hours. This is like a period pain. You may need to take a mild painkiller to help with any discomfort.

Will I bleed afterwards?

You may have a blood-stained discharge for up to four weeks after your treatment.

However, if the discharge lasts more than four weeks or starts to smell offensive, contact your GP or the Colposcopy Clinic.

If you have any heavy bleeding, please contact your GP or the Colposcopy Clinic.

Your cervix will heal with little or no scarring.

We recommend that you do not use tampons, have showers instead of baths and avoid swimming until the discharge has stopped completely.

How soon afterwards can I have sex?

While your cervix is healing, it is vulnerable to infection and damage. For this reason, we advise you not to have sex for four weeks or until the discharge has stopped completely.

Do I need time off work?

No. You can carry out all your normal activities including work although it is advisable to avoid strenuous exercise for a couple of weeks.

How and when will I receive my result?

You may have had a cervical biopsy (small sample of tissue) taken as well – if this is the case, the clinic doctor will contact you and your GP with your results by letter. This can take up to 4-6 weeks. Unfortunately, we are unable to give you your results over the telephone.

Do I need to see the doctor again?

You may not need to see the doctor again. If you have had a biopsy, the clinic doctor will contact you by letter to discuss whether any further treatment is necessary. However, if you have any concerns following your cautery, please contact your GP.
